My Country 'Tis of Thee Rudolph M. Unger

The 20th Century high point of The United States of America was beyond doubt World War II. Never was the unity of the American people more manifest than during that crisis. Following that war's end, a deterioration in the unified resolve of the people began a steady weakening of the nation's fiber. The nation faced many external and internal challenges and problems. Communism, primarily in the form of The Soviet Union and Red China, posed a formidable foe - taking over Eastern Europe and, less than six years after WW II, thrust the United States into another war when it fomented the attack on South Korea. It opened up its next front of conquest in Asia by attacking South Viet Nam, again propelling the United States in another war, the most divisive since the Civil War. At home, Socialism, in the form of the Welfare State, was eating away at the resolve of Americans to be self-reliant, responsible, free and independent people, wary of government's control over their lives. The combination of Statism abroad and at home, along with an insidious corruption of the morals of the people, threatened the spiritual underpinning of the federal republic. A growing distaste for combating evil abroad and an increasing craving for material pleasures and a disdain for facing up to responsibilities was steadily chipping away at the once proud character of Americans. The revolting 1960s quickly brought to the surface the dangerous under-currents that threatened to jeopardize the peace, strength, stability and safety of the nation. Concerned by these adverse developments, the author decided to do battle with those concepts and those persons who would turn America into a selfish, cringing, shadowy figment of its historic self. So, in 1971, he started the "My Country, 'Tis of Thee" monthly newsletters to defend the principles and institutions which had made The United States of America the greatest nation on earth.
